The big central gates swing open and the plumed bailiffs lead out a procession, first of the three matadores, in their brilliant shirts, silk costumes embroidered in gold, their red stockings and black slippers and the rich, flowered caps they wear only for this short parade. Behind them come the team of all their assistants, other fighters in costumes trimmed with silver or black braid, then a little team of jumping jacks, in red jackets and caps and blue baggy trousers and white shoes. They could well be the monkeyish clowns we imagined at a medieval fair that indeed is their name, monisabios, clever monkeys. They will need to be, for they are the picador's helpers, and they may today or some other time save the picador's life.

Questions: -
